Acupressure is likewise a type of bodywork and numerous massage therapists incorporate this particular method into their massage routines in order to better serve their customers. Typically, an Acupressure session leaves the client feeling more energized and less stress. Acupressure can relieve a myriad of symptoms when it is done by an expert practitioner.

Traditional Chinese Medicine utilizes various basic principles that have been refined over thousands of years of medical practice. One of the essential principles is that health is governed by the flow of qi or life force all through the body. Medical complaints are said to be triggered by interruptions to this flow, as the body's energy balance becomes disturbed. Practitioners of Traditional Chinese Medicine believe that disruptions in the flow of qi affect certain organs and hence; all signs could be associated and traced back to a certain organ.

Qi follows an assortment of meridians, or major pathways as it flows throughout the body. Each and every meridian carries qi in various ways to different organs. When an Acupressure practitioner diagnoses a problem, they know particularly what meridian is affected. The meridians of the body are broken up into a detailed series of pressure points. These points are controlled physically to treat different indications. These pressure points are found by locating the meridian and making use of certain parts of the body as landmarks.

For a usual Acupressure session, customers are asked to lie upon a table draped or blanketed with sheets. Some practitioners will work on fully clothed customers, while some prefer to work directly on the skin. When the session is blended with Western massage techniques, undressing is more applied, though, no massage therapist would ask the client to go past their comfort level. Through the session, the practitioner often takes a few quick passes over the customer so as to familiarize themselves with the customer, while asking about certain problems she or he is experiencing.

The Acupressure therapist then makes use of varying degrees of pressure on particular pressure points on the body. Depending on the needs of the client and the preferences of the practitioner, elbows, hands and also several tools could be used to be able to apply a certain amount of pressure. The flow of the client's qi is intended to even out over the course of the treatment, and hopefully, relief is brought to the symptoms that the client has discussed about. These sessions can be really energizing and also cathartic, normally the client goes through a flood of emotion.
